

by the Old Reader

The Old Reader is back, older still. This time he protests against the superficiality with which the media tackle the subject of translation, although they do approach it more and more often, and criticizes the evaluation system of the academic world, which contributes to isolating academic culture from the rest of society. With a couple of final jibes at Einaudi and Paolo Nori.